ccepts Honorary Vice-Presidency in a Letter Sent to Gen. Wingate, He Praises the Work That It is Doing.

OYSTER BAY, Aug. 25. The following letter was sent by President Roosevelt to Gen. George W. Wingate in response to a letter tendering him the office of honorary vice-president of the Public Schools Athletic League:

OYSTER BAY, N. Y., Aug. 19, '05.

that it will give me the greatest pleasure to accept the office of honorary vice-presient of the Public Schools Athletic League. of which you are president. I most heartily believe in your league, and I feel that in promoting athletics among the school children of New York city along the sane and healthy lines it has followed it is performing a service which is of the utmost importance, not merely from the standpoint of the physical, but also from the standpoint of the ethical needs of these school children. You have every reason to be proud of the success with which you have met. You have organized twenty-two strong district leagues, comprised of the superintendents, teachers and members of the local school boards in the different educational district of New York, and have established a regular series of athletic contests, so that this year fully thirty thousand boys competed for place in your games, and their chosen champions won the championship at St.

"I am glad that you have installed in each of four high schools a sub-target rifle practise and are teaching the boys to shoot with the Krag, and I am pleased with the great success that you have met in this effort. You have done an enormous amount, my dear General, in connection with the National Rifle Association and Creedmoor. and all good citizens owe you a debt of gratitude for what you have thus accomplished. But, upon my word, I think that you are doing even greater and more far reaching good in connection with this work of the Public Schools Athletic League. I am particularly pleased to see that you give a button, analogous to the marksman badge of the National Guard, to every boy who can make a prescribed record in certain simple exercises, so that you interest and appeal to the boys who cannot expect to win in competitions. I see that you allow no boy to compete for this button, or indeed in your games, who is not up to the average in studies and deportment and that you in every possible way seek to impress upon them the fact that part of the character of every honorable athlete is to despise all that is mean or base.

"I know that what your league has done has already had a fine effect upon the character and physique of the boys and upon the discipline of the schools. The great congestion in population, which of course means the crowded streets as well as the provided by uses has resulted in describing rowied houses, has resulted in depriving the children of New York of opportunity for exercise, especially in the tenement house districts, so that their physical development tends to drop below the normal. The energies they should work off in whole some exercise to wigorous play find year The energies they should work off in wholesome exercise, in vigorous play; find vent in the worst feats of the gangs which represent so much that is vicious in our city life. It is a great disadvantage to a boy to be unable to play games, and every boy who knows how to play baseball or football, to box or to wrestle, has by just so much fitted himself to be a better citizen.

"I know of the difficulty you have encountered in securing grounds for exercise, and how you have been obliged to utilize armories, school rooms and vacant lots, and I am delighted that the city has been induced to make an appropriation for four athletic fields, which the league has agreed to fit up and run. I am also particularly pleased that you are about to organize a pleased that you are about to organize a woman's auxiliary branch, for the girls need exercise quite as much as do the boys.

"The demands such a movement makes upon the time and the money of those engaged therein are very heavy. You are doing one of the greatest and most patriotic titled to the heartiest backing in every way from all who appreciate the vital need of having the rising generation of Americans sound in body, mind and soul. Sincerely yours, THEODORE ROOSEVELT.

To Gen. GEORGE WINGATE, President Public School Athletic League, New York."

Queer Fish From Bermuda in Great Variety -Dr. Brush's Lamentable Losses.

Chief among a fine collection of tropical fish that arrived at the Aquarium yesterday from Bermuda is a seacat, a species of cuttlefish distinguished for the playful, kittenlike way it conducts itself toward everything that comes within its immediate environment. Fellow voyagers of the seacat were a snakefish, marked with gray bands; speckled morays, angle fish and a green parrotfish.

The fish are the fourth and last consignment of the season from Bermuda. They came in eight tanks in charge of Dr. C. E. came in eight tanks in charge of Dr. C. E. Brush, assistant to Prof. Bristo!. When Dr. Brush started from Bermuda, aboard the Quebec line steamship Bermudian, on Wednesday, he had an unsurpassed collection of sea anemones, but all died on the voyage. Dr. Brush had expected to bring with him a nine foot green moray, one of the largest ever seen in captivity. Before he could come to terms with the man who had caught the eellike creature it also died. Its death was due to the inadequate accommodations the fisherman had provided for it.

Prof. Bristol says the Aquarium has a finer collection of submarine dwellers than ever before.

AUTO SPEEDER FINED 850. E. Munger Says He Is a Son of the Lieutenant-Governor of Alabama. Eugene Munger, 23 years old, said to be son of R. S. Munger, Lieutenant-Governor of Alabama, was fined $50 in Special Sessions resterday for speeding with an automobile. Policeman Duber of the traffic squad testified that Munger drove his machine at a speed of thirty miles an hour.

Munger is stopping at the Waldorf-Astoria and said he would soon start for the South to take part in some motor races.

An M. E. Braddon Story.

Some of the old names are properly re-membered. We have taken up with pleasure and very respectfully "The Rose of Life," by M. E. Braddon (Brentano's). Daniel Lester, the poet here, immediately in-terested us. He was of the heaven born kind. He had dramatic qualifications and lived poetry as well as wrote it. He was large and massive, as it seems to us that a poet needs to be if he is going to give body to his ideals in everyday practise. We had much rather be six feet four than four feet six if we were bent upon going about and being a poet obviously. It is painful to think what humiliations may befall a small poet insistent upon self-revelations in promiseuous company. Our Daniel was safe enough. He was large enough, and he had the other especial gifts necessary to carry the matter through. We have found ourselves envying his appetite and his capacity to bear off the results of the same. Ortolans, goose livers, champagne, we dare say Welsh rabbits and old ale-he carried them all comfortably off in his capacious and gifted interior and thought sublime poetry on the strength of them. On the shores of the Mediterranean, in select places, after gorging himself, he walked home under the stars and dashed off poetry that his imposing reputation enabled him to sell at prices that would have been exorbitant for any other commodity. What does the story say? At page 58 we read:

"He had caroused with friends and admirers at Monte Carlo till after midnight, and then, on coming home in the quiet hours, when the world sleeps and the stars are brightest, he had flung himself upon a quire of foolecap as a tiger on his prey, and had written in a white heat of inspiration, throwing sheet after sheet of his large, heavy writing, on the floor, till it"creaked? nay—"was carpeted with the rough drafts of his story poem. It was his habit to write thus with a flying pen, and afterward to lick his verse into shape, as the she bear licks her young, and with an epicurean enjoyment of his own genius.

He enjoyed himself and was interesting at both ends of the expanse of his conscious moments. He littered his room with precious and measured thoughts before he laid his large head on a downy pillow. At noon he awoke with a placid craving for chocolate and bread and butter. The chocolate was abundant and delicately served: the rolls were numerous, with white insides: the butter was iced, and an adoring wife, who had brought a gratifying dowry, spread the fair rolls with the cold butter. There is joy in being a poet if one knows exactly how.

Our poet returning home in the early hours took note of the scented night and of the waning moon. "The moon is old," he murmured. "She lies on her back like tired creature." His thoughts took a melancholy direction. He was Jeremiah. He lamented. He smoked. He saw a girl of good figure throw herself into the tideless He got her out. He took her home and delivered her into the care of his middle class sensible wife. He bestowed upon her the name of the Sea Anemone. He got a rich lady-Lady Beauminster-to take her as governess to three difficult Chinese poodle dogs. He investigated the case of the Sea Anemone's mother. That lady he discovered had led the life of a beautiful and thoughtless creature. She had cultivated low company for the sake of suppers with wine and board and chances at the Monte Carlo games. The Ses Anemone herself had been married, but happily she was not bounden. Her husband, music hall singer of Spanish extraction, was a bigamist, already burdened with a drunken wife. The Sea Anemone forsook him promptly when the wife in question presented herself and made a row in the public street.

We must confess to being sorry for Lady Beauminster. She married for money She got it. She became a widow shortly. Her lover, a soldier in India, might have had her at the end of seven years, a period that did not half deter the scriptural Jacob. Gen. Sir Malcolm Belford overlooked her when he came home. We consider it no excuse for him that his liver had been touched. We believe he was 49 when he turned from Lady Beauminster to the governess of Lady Beauminster's dogs, the Sea Anemone. He turned from a rich and gifted woman, a beautiful woman, too. Where else could the General have had tea more pleasantly served than at Lady Beauminster's house in the Riviera? She had even brought exotic attractions to that already sufficient place of abode. Daniel, the poet, knew. He loved to go to Lady Beauminster's for goose liver sandwiches and tea. We read: "Lady Beauminster was sitting in a low chair in the veranda of the Japanese tea house, a fairylike edifice which had been brought over in packing cases from the flowery isles and set up in this southern garden where it seemed in its right place against a background of tall, black stemmed bamboos. The lady's dark blue satin tea gown, scrawled over with gold and scarlet embroidery, had a certain Japanese air which harmonized with her dark beauty. The face, worn by a decade of intense life, had perhaps more of distinction than of absolute beauty. The oval contour and fall, and I rode ninety miles to see you. soft lines of youth had sharpened into a chiseled keenness as of bronze, and all that there was of originality and power in the features and expression had become accentuated by the burning of the flame within. Daniel read her like a book, and knew how much of life weariness and suppressed passion those worn lines indicated.

Daniel knew, but Sir Malcolm was either uninstructed or careless. He was within a year of the half century. Sharp chiseling was not so particularly to his notion. He looked through his probable spectacles for the soft contour and the down. He reverted. He swept easily through his suppressed inclination a distance of thirty years. He married the Sea Anemone, whom the poet had saved. The poet was full of fine appreciation of "Clarissa Harlowe" and "Trilby." We confess we were glad of his reasonable eloquence in behalf of "Trilby." We sorrowed that he should have been wrong in sordid particulars. He uttered fraudulent bank checks in Lady Beauminster's name. He acquired £5,000 by forgeries inexcusable under any strict construction of the moral law. We our-selves would have forgiven him, weak and wrong though it may have been, and of course practically inexpensive; but Lady Beauminster was jealous, and could not overlook the fact that he had saved the Sea Anemone to come between her and Sir

Malcolm. The poet palled upon us a little; he irked us, as everybody is apt to do who insists upon a pose; but we were sorry that Lady Beauminster should have been hard with him in so small a matter as $5,000, which he could have earned by his poetry and devoted to his rehabilitation if he had had time. The Sea Anemone survived tempests and came out happy This has seemed to us reasonable, and the more reasonable because the post and Lady Beauminster will stir up elderly memories. The incidents hardly make up a story. Mr. Shute are grateful in these cautious days for so is a trifle preachy at times, and makes up great a measure of poetic justice. A readable and excellently written story.

Casey From America

We have what we are willing to regard as the original and historical case of Casey at the bat in the opening part of Canon Sheehan's story of "Glenanaar" (Longmans, Green & Co.). This characteristic Irish tale, which makes use of a good deal of history, introduces to us in the beginning a visitor in Ireland who was plainly from the United States, and for that reason was called "The Yank" in the village where he very splendidly descended. "He took our breath away with his grandeur," says his historian, "and people looked at him sideways, partly because of his dazzling equipment and partly because he had a curious habit of looking one straight in the face, which is sometimes disconcerting." He is guilty of one shortcoming which we are given to understand is surely fatal to the chances of anybody for popularity in an Irish village-he refused steadfastly to aleviate curiosity concerning himself and his business. At the same time he was a fine man physically; his proportions filled the eye; as he stood in his princely American clothes there was no mistaking his great athletic potentialities.

On a Sunday afternoon in the late summer there was a hurling match in the village park. It was the Cork Shandons against the brave home Skirmishers. Nothing less than the county championship was involved. The interest and expectation had long been tremendous; it is probable that every soul from Glenanaar to Twopothouse was present or mad with disappointment at not being. The outpouring, indeed, was mighty, and must have proceeded in large measure from points even more remote. The author lingers pleasurably upon its numbers and its fine appearance. "It would," he says, "surprise any one familiar with all the modern, doleful jeremiads about the depopulation of Ireland to see such a smartly dressed, bright, intelligent crowd in a country village. And if he had any misgivings or doubts about the physique and pluck of the fighting race, he had only to stand still when the a hietes striped for the contests, and see in those clean out, well knit figures the nerve and muscles that go to build up an energetic and pushing race." The powerful figure from America was noticeable, though he tried to make himself inconspicuous. When the warring masses came together and the din and tumult of the field were at their height he smoked calmly and betrayed no extraordinary interest. Shortly before 5 o'clock, however, he saw fit to arouse himself. The home captain had been taken suddenly ill. There was consternation in the ranks of the Skirmishers. Who was there to take the captain's place? The man from America took it In a liffy he had the ball and was irresistibly on his way to the goal of the Shandons. Stop him? As well attempt to dam up the waters of the Nile with bulrushes. He cut his way through the futile opposition "as clean as a swath of ripe corn is leveled by the teeth of the mowing machine in the early harvest time." The historian heard him cry, "T'ainim an diaoul" as he swept by, and knew him then for an Irishman. An aged onlooker expressed an opinion. Begobs," said he, "there was nothin seen like it since Casey the Hurler's time.' The man from America was touched. Said he: "Say that again, mister." "I say," repeated the aged onlooker, "that there was nothin' seen like that since Terence Casey, singlebanded, bate the parishes of Ardpatrick and Glenroe." The wonder was explained a little later. The man from America was no other than Terence Casey himself-even Casey the Hurler, in whose honor was created the fine and stirring ballad which runs:

Then here's to bould young Casey! Like a lion did he chase ye. From the Galtees to the Funcheon. From the Funcheon to the say: Sure nayther Mars nor Heethor When bould young Casey's hurley It went dancing through the fray

The story goes back to certain famous and lamentable history in tracing Casey's ancestry. It relates the trial of the socalled Doneraile conspirators at the Cork Assizes in October, 1829. Perjured witnesss and a hostile judiciary were carrying matters with a high hand. Perfectly and obviously innocent men were in danger of being legally hanged when young William Burke, brother of one of the victims, rode ninety miles after the great O'Connell, the "one man in Ireland in the world" capable of making an effective defense. The messenger carried the dire, true story for persuasion and 100 guineas for a fee. Furiously he rode. Wayfarers meeting him leaped aside into the ditches to save themselves. " 'Tis a ride for life or death!" they said to one another. "Children cowered over the half smouldering embers in their cabins when the swift, heavy tread of the gallop smote their ears, and they whispered: 'The head-O'Connell was resting from his Parliamentary labors in his remote retreat of Derrynane, on the Atlantic edge of the Kingdom of Kerry. It was a Sabbath morning and he was at breakfast when young Burke was brought in to him. Said Burke: "I left Cork last evening at night-Counselor. There are four men already under sentence of death in Cork on account of the Doneraile conspiracy. There are seventeen more to be tried, among them my brother John. If you don't come Doherty (Crown Advocate) will hang every mother's son of them. Here are a hundred guineas! If you come our men are saved, and you'll have the blessings of their mothers and wives forever!" O'Connell was at the Cork Assizes next morning, and he saved them. The story goes on to relate much that is interesting. It tells how Casey the Hurler found and wedded the woman whom he had loved in his youth. We have read the book with the result of much instruction, entertainment and pleasure.

The New England Small Boy.

It is with some reluctance that we opened Mr. Henry A. Shute's "Real Boys" (G. W. Dillingham & Co.). The author's "Real Diary" was a little masterpiece. If it was not a diary kept at the time, it reproduced New England life of forty years ago so vividly and truthfully that it can stand as a document, for the writer's memory has been as faithful as any written entrie would be. It would be too much to expect, however, that every healthy boy should keep a whole set of diaries, and the question was how Mr. Shute could the popularity of his first little book.

He has solved the difficulty oy diluting and amplifying the "diary." The same small Exeter townies and their doings are shown up in "Real Boys." It is a very pleasant book to read. It is a photograph of a cheerful little New England town in the last years of the war, that rouses regretful memories of days less hurried than the present. The boys are real enough and their games and scrapes and sayings by artiesmess for the graces of style, but it is the bygone New England he tells about and the sort of boys she produces.

Their ways and talk are not wholly those of to-day, for these boys lived before baseball and paraffin chewing gum and telephones and bioycles. But they had their full share of fun, which the reader may share in Mr. Shute's pages, and we doubt not just, that sort of fun is delighting sturdy young New England now wherever the own has not encroached too much upon the country.

French Textbooks.

One penalty of attaining distinction in literature nowadays is to see the child of your fancy turned into a textbook for the nstruction of youth by enthusiastic young college teachers. Their desire to annotate something new at times runs away with their discretion. That we fear is the case with Prof. O. G. Guerlac of Cornell University, who edits part of Anatole France's Le Livre de Mon Ami" (Henry Holt & Co.) There is no more delightful writer of French prose now living than Anatole France; it almost looks, in this age of strenuous young Frenchmen, more eager to attract attention than to respect their language, as though the art of writing good French would die with him. It is not difficult French, either, in a way, but it can only be really understood and enjoyed by those who can read the language fluently and who know a good deal of French literature. His ingenious and unexpected allusions form one of the charms of his humor, and that, with much of his wit and mischief, must be lost on the boy who has to spell it out with a dictionary. One might as well try to adapt Voltaire or Diderot to the classroom. The book Prof. Guerlac has selected is wholly unobjectionable in tone; it is a charming bit of autobiography; but that college classes will be interested by it or will appreciate its delicacy we are inclined to doubt.

Alphonee Daudet's "Robert Helmont" has the merit of being of the right length to publish complete. It has been edited by Mr. W. O. Farnsworth of Yale University (Henry Holt & Co.). Here again we doubt whether the story has sufficient interest for students who know so little Flench as to be obliged to use the vocabulary provided at the back of the

A classic of the classroom, Erokmann Chatrian's "Waterloo," or at least a certain portion of the story, is edited anew by Mr. Victor E. François of the College of the City of New York (Henry Holt & Co.). It is well adapted for the classroom. The editor provides introduction, notes, vocabulary, composition exercises and questions on the text

Hints to the Bibulous. An adventurous cruise through many dangers is described in "The Log of the Water Wagon," by Bert Leston Taylor and W. C. Gibson (H. M. Caldwell Company, Boston). Uproarious fun turning on a single idea may weary if kept up too long; so the reader is advised to put an interval between the six days of the voyage. The pictures and decorative border are good and as carefully adapted to expressing advertisements and incidents. Of the cruise itself we shall say nothing, but some extracts that can be detached may give an idea of the humor of the book: Hitch your wagon to a star. If it's the Water the thought of the book as are the puns,

Hitch your wagon to a star. If it's the water Wagon, ite to the Great Dipper. Emerson.

Most of the gold cures are only plated, and it soon wears off. Recley.

When you move from Brooklyn, be sure to burn your bridge tickets behind you. McKelway.

Treat and the world drinks with you; quit and leaves you slone. Horace.

A watered slik vest is not a badge of temperance. Never judge a man by his vests. Woodruff. The book is prettily gotten up and has a striking Japanesque cover.

Fietion.

It is not pleasant to watch a writer of talent struggling with a high moral purpose provided by the lady who, under the name Octave Thanet, has written many graceful short tales, in her long novel "The Man of the Hour" (The Bobbs-Merrill Company, Indianapolis). She has sketched interest-ing characters; the hero, for instance, and his father and most of the women and some of the lesser people are good. She may have had a story in her mind at the start, at any rate she could easily have drifted into one. But the pall of sociology covers all. At the beginning we get some theatrical Russian nihilism with violence; later we have the labor question from two sides, also with violence. We are unable to discern any development in the hero from these extraneous matters; he simply changes his mind from time to time. The one strong theme, his being won over at last by his stepmother and his adopting his father's views of life, could have been developed without the sociology. We have found the book hard to read.

For a book published by the author Mr. William Marabell's "Sherman Wat-terson" (no imprint) is something of a surprise. Critics usually discover soon why the publishers do not care for a book, but this story is certainly as good as most that appear. There are scenes and incidents that are novel, the characters are sketched vigorously and the tale is one of everyday life. The construction is rather clumsy and too much stress is put on unimportant matters. There are marks of the novice. But plenty of widely read books have like faults which do not seem to diminish their popularity.

There is dash and plenty of excitement in Mr. Francis Lynde's short story "A Fool for Love" (The Bobbs-Merrill Company). It involves an intrigue of railroading, and we fear that neither in this nor in many of the actions of the people, male and female, has the author worried much about probability. We must not ask too much, however, from a short story that is readable. How "The Greater Waterloo," by Robert Richardson (G. W. Dillingham Company), could have found a publisher is a mystery. Sentimentality, commonplace sensationalism, an amazing ignorance of English institutions and customs are combined with what seems to be a lack of familiarity with English. The scene is put in Canada, but the people are mostly German immigrants.

SUIT TO HOLD ACTORS.

Claims of "Me, Him and I" versus "Tom Dick and Harry"-What Is a Stage Year? Hurtig & Seamon appeared through their counsel, Leon Laski, before Supreme Court Justice Giegerich yesterday to ask for L. Bickel and Harry Watson, Jr., from entering into any contract to perform with other companies than the one now playing daughter, Elva Cora, to Dr. Peter Kahler of Mount Vernon, N. Y. "Me, Him and I." Hurtig & Seamon claim that on Oct. 17, 1903, Bickel and Watson bound themselves to play in "Me, Him and I' for two years, with a renewal clause providing for a six months notice. The notice was given but the actors, according notice was given but the actors, according to Laski, have declined to renew or even finish out their contract. Bickel and Watson are billed to play shortly in "Tom, Dick and Harry" under a different management. David Gerber, for the actors, opposed the motion and set up that the original contract had been violated in the provisions relating to the billing of the pair. Mr. Gerber also argued that there was a legal question involved as to whether a year in a theatrical contract meant twelve months or just the theatrical season. If the latter, he contended, the renewal notice was not given in time, as it was not given within six months of the expiration of the season.

ason. Decision was reserved. PARK THEATER MAY CLOSE. Brookive Playhouse Is Given Up by Lessee

-Expensive Changes Demanded. The Park Theater, most notable of Brooklyn's old playhouses, will probably be closed, for the coming season at least. Hyde & for the coming season at least. Hyde & Behman have been the lessees for a number of years. The theater was to have been opened last Monday, but was not been opened last Monday, but was not because the alterations ordered by the Health Department had not been made. The lessees learned that the changes would cost thousands of dollars and decided not to foot the bill, holding that it was up to the owner, the Felix Campbell estate, to have the work done. They have given up the lease.

Every great actor and actress who has been on the stage during the last thirty years, except Henry Irving, has appeared at the Park. It is believed the theater has ended its career as an amusement house.
